Turning Our Savings Into a Renewable Revenue Fund

High oil prices and a progressive tax system have given Alaska unprecedented returns for our natural resources. We have repaid the money we borrowed over the years from our own savings account, the Constitutional Budget Reserve, and we continue to grow other savings accounts. Now, during this time of relative financial strength, we can move to turn these non-renewable resources into secure and renewable sources of revenue.

House Joint Resolution 7 which I have introduced will do just that. By turning the Constitutional Budget Reserve into an endowment much like other large-scale endowments such as the Ford Foundation and Yale University, this resolution would protect both our financial reserves and our future by ensuring a steady stream of revenue for a time when oil profits are reduced through declining volume or low prices. "Extra" revenue from oil taxes at high prices would go directly into the principal of the fund. After inflation proofing, the fund would spin off 5% for state use. Spending any of the principal would require a public vote.

The Constitutional Budget Reserve currently holds around $10 billion. This fund would spin off approximately $500-600 million each year in the first year, while providing a reasonable cap on legislative spending. It is projected that over time, the deposits and earning will both increase. The long-term economic health of Alaska demands that the State develop a management plan for our revenue stream, and this resolution would be a key first step toward a sensible long-term plan.

If passed by the Legislature, HJR 7 would be put to the voters in 2012.

WORKING HARD TO SOLVE YOUR PROBLEMS.

Residents of the Little Tree Street area came to Sen. Ellis and me after a foot-high frost heave appeared in the middle of their road. Rated by some as one of the worst roads in Anchorage, the hump in the road caused many neighbors to bottom-out and lose their mufflers.

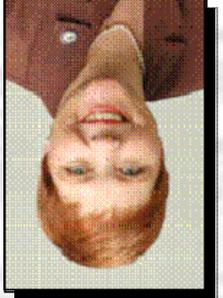

Sen. Ellis and I worked to get funding for a road resurfacing program that included Little Tree. Now local residents can get safely to and from their homes. Let me know if YOU have an issue or problem I can help you with.
